Japan puts solar panels on giant telescope - in space The giant Subaru Telescope in Hawaii captures this amazing view of a red supergiant star with a sun-like yellow dwarf star in its orbit. Flourishing professional astronomical projects have received the seal of approval from the government, which has invested in the hydrogen absorption spectrum to detect galaxies where light was captured from the formation of the universe. Other past astronomical projects, including the construction of the world's largest telescope and the launch of the world's first satellite to provide detailed information about the sun, have been stalled by cuts in the government budget. But bureaucrats now believe in the economic and environmental value of the space programme, and have found money to back Japanese scientific projects. The project to place solar panels on the Subaru Telescope, which was launched into space by a rocket in 2013, will boost the capacity of the solar panels by an estimated 45-fold, giving it more than a 10th of the light-collecting power of the Hubble Space Telescope. The Tsukuba Space Center, where the telescope is located, may be able to sell electricity produced by the panels to the Japan Electric Power Company Holdings Inc. Japan's lunar probe, Hayabusa2, is expected to release a sample capsule containing organic compounds on the surface of an asteroid late this month in a mission that would "help scientists pinpoint the circumstances of our universe and search for life elsewhere,” Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said in a recent speech. The nation has been watching the attempt for a decade with keen interest, along with China, India and the United States. “Japan had demonstrated the effectiveness of space exploration and our ability to use them to benefit our society and the globe as a whole,” said Atsuko Koyanagi, a scientist with the space agency, the Japan Aerospace Exploration Agency. “We can also share this experience with the rest of the world.” Last year, the space agency unveiled a plan for long-term development of an independent manned space programme. The budget for this year's space programme will be 5.07 trillion yen ($45 billion), an increase of 11.9 percent from last year. A space budget-setting agency also has approved the launch of Hayabusa2 and a lunar probe, to be developed jointly by the US, Russia and Japan.Q: Determine
