Q: (RxSwift) Observable with Single Element - Do I need to call subscribeWith error handler I have an iOS app that uses RxSwift to load and possibly store data locally. I'm used to in Android using single then onSubscalbe, which gives your eventual single result a handler by which you can capture errors (or maybe not). This is how I see it working for iOS too. Is there something different happening in RxSwift - so when I use Observable.single() I have to ensure I has a handler subscribed to it. It looks like single is equivalent to the android then, until you try to subscribe. A: It's not really clear what you're asking, but maybe this helps: enum MyError { case One(Int) } let observable: Observable = Observable.single(1).catch(MyError.One) { // this will return a true for any error case } let observableBoolean = observable.subscribeWith({ // Note that this selector block has no handler. // It will never get called. }, onError: MyError.One) The observable you've created will never try and call your selector block. Q: How do I iterate and submit through multiple forms with php and mysql? I have an application where people can apply for scholarships. I wish to have this page be a simple 'choose more scholarships' style front page where people select multiple scholarships to apply for. Here's what I have now, it's working pretty well and the scholarship is posted when a person selects the 'Submit' button. Scholarship Posts
