Emails from a digital archive show a US diplomat boasting about his “ongoing co-option of the Prime Minister of Mongolia” before telling the then-head of the country’s spy service that he wanted information on an opposition leader. In a 2010 email, Nathan Sales, then-ambassador at the US Embassy in Ulaanbaatar, boasted about having “ongoing co-option of the Prime Minister of Mongolia” and added, “do you want info on his Chief of Staff?”. He also sought to persuade the head of the Mongolian National Security Service, Dashdorj Davaasuregdamba, to provide information on opposition leader Bayar Mongol. The cables, part of a trove of documents released on Wednesday by WikiLeaks, were sent in response to a request by Davaasuregdamba for help in quashing a criminal investigation. Sales asked for “the status of the current investigation in Mongolia and what are the chances of the prosecutor being removed?”. “Do you want me to ‘push’ on that with Mongolian Min of Intelligence?” Mongolia ranks among the world’s least democratic countries and previously rejected two US Senate resolutions that recognized the independence of the Oyu Tolgoi copper project in the country’s north, the world’s largest gold-and-copper mine. To speed up the project, Washington had recently lifted its arms embargo on Mongolia, triggering a scramble for mines and concessions on the country’s vast territory by the US, Russia and other major mining companies. Another email from August 2010 shows Sales offering to share information he gathered on “opposition leader Bayar Mongol”. Sales said he had information on Bayar that “a few of us have been quietly sitting on”. “Would you be interested? If so, I will need to get that passed on to you.” The archive contains less than two dozen other emails from Sales, many of which are routine and cover mundane topics such as his family. But it includes one from February 2010 in which he asked Davaasuregdamba for updates on the investigation into a meeting between two opposition activists and a colleague
